About the Project

Migrations in Literature is a pioneering collaborative and interdisciplinary research project that seeks to bring the social phenomenon of migration into conjunction with the study of literature. A defining characteristic of the present era, migration is nonetheless a transhistorical occurrence and a constant feature of human societies. The project considers how the written word has captured and distilled a process so ubiquitous, translating it into literary forms and languages in the past and in the present. By developing a vocabulary and roadmap for bringing histories of migration and of literature into a mutually illuminating relation, the project explores what is lost in the attempt to represent migration, and also what is produced or preserved. The members of the research team – Hadji Bakara (University of Michigan), Jo McDonagh (University of Chicago), and Charlotte Sussman (Duke University) – have organized two workshops covering “Methods and Periods” and “Geographies and Genres.” Over 50 scholars have participated, with expertise spanning literary texts from antiquity to the present and representing fields that range from political science, geography, English, classics, comparative literature, Oceanic humanities, to South Asian Studies, Africana Studies, Latinx studies and digital humanities). Their contributions will be included in The Oxford Companion to History and Literature (under contract with Oxford University Press). As a capstone to the project, a final conference will bring scholars of literature and migration into conversation with migrant writers and educators.

About the Neubauer Collegium
